

React provides a declarative API so that you don't have to worry about exactly what changes on every update.

Reconciliation is responsible for doing that.

Reconciliation is the React's “diffing” algorithm.
It makes component updates more predictable.

When a component's state changes, React has to calculate if it is necessary to update the instances.